Standard reply from skeptics when confronted with our 9/11 VICSIM research:

"If the 9/11 victims were fake, why don't you go and tell that to the many grieving families out there?"

Last Saturday (Oct 22, 2011) our valiant member Sai Girl did just that. My deepest admiration goes to her and the fine way she handled what one would imagine to be - and let's be honest about that - a rather daunting and potentially hazardous initiative. The Sai Girl and I have exchanged e-mails lately concerning the alleged family members of "Honor Elizabeth Wainio", who supposedly perished in "FLIGHT 93". It so happens that the Sai Girl lives in the Baltimore area where this family lives - and also knows about the Ropewalk Tavern, a joint where they stage yearly fundraising events for the so-called "Honor Elizabeth Wainio Communications Memorial Scholarship". The other day, we found out (see link below) that this year's event was to be held on Saturday, October 22 - and so Sai Girl decided to join the party...

(Of course, "Honor Elizabeth Wainio" should ring almost as a 'household name' to our forum members - and to anyone familiar with the Vicsim research (by Hoi Polloi and yours truly) at the September Clues website: http://septemberclues.info/vicsims_photo-analyses.htm)

So, without further ado, here's the full (unedited) account of the Sai Girl's adventures at the Ropewalk Tavern:

(from the Baltimore-Washington Security Zone Corridor)

Salutations and greetings to Simon and Hoi Polloi,

I hope this finds you in good health and good spirits.

As promised, here is my detailed report on the 2011 annual "Fundraiser for Honor Elizabeth Wainio Communications Scholarship" sponsored by Towson State University on Saturday, October 22, 2011 at the Ropewalk Tavern in south Baltimore.

<http://www.elizabethwainio.com/main/events.cfm>

I arrived at the scene approximately one-half hour before the event's official start time in order to scout out the terrain and potential obstacles to the mission.

I was armed with 50 copies of a stapled color printed handout; each one six pages long with captioned images and narratives of all the various photo-shopped images of Liz Wainio (essentially copied and pasted from the September Clues/VicSim WEB site).

The first page had blow-ups of the two most egregious and transparently obvious examples of photo-shopping: the now legendary shots of "Liz with wine cup/ Liz without wine cup". Also the "winter, spring, summer" pictures of Liz.

I entered the Ropewalk Tavern quietly and walked through the bar and its dining rooms, counting about two dozen people already in the tavern. One room had a row of tables set up with various objects for sale at the "silent auction".

The mood seemed very upbeat and lively with joking, laughing and back-slapping. There were decorations of a celebratory nature around the place, festooned with flags, patriotic themes and a few "memorial photos" of Liz.

But the largest and most striking feature was a color picture of the late President Ronald Reagan posted against the background of an American flag. The huge picture of Reagan struck me as rather narrow and partisan for an ostensible "9/11 victim memorial event".

Almost as though the memory of Reagan were more important than memorializing Liz. After all, Maryland is an overwhelmingly "blue" state. Republicans (and "conservatives") are a small minority here. And the Baltimore metropolitan area is even more so.

The Ropewalk Tavern establishments (there's another one up north in Bel Air, Maryland) are owned by the McFaul family, which regularly sponsors events to raise funds and support for the tiny handful of Maryland neo-cons in their intrepid but usually futile struggle for political traction here in the state. It seemed strangely discordant and inappropriate to be so ideologically narrow and politically partisan around this kind of event. As though they were crassly and opportunistically exploiting "the tragedy of 9/11" to advance a minority factional agenda on behalf of the Republican Party.

I would guess that most of the students and alumni of Towson State University are quite liberal and more likely to vote for Democrats. But clearly no Democrats or liberals would have been very welcome or comfortable at this particular event.

The "family" were there (father Ben and stepmother Esther Heymann) but it was clear that the star of the event was "sister" Sarah Wainio (a psychology graduate of Fordham University) who normally works as a barmaid at the tavern, when she's not working at the "Ulman Cancer Fund for Young Adults".

<http://www.ulmanfund.org/About-Us/Our-T...ainio.aspx>

Sarah was the "Queen Bee" of the occasion, decked out very fashionably (perhaps a bit heavy on the makeup), laughing and celebrating; clearly the center of attention. In fact, I had the impression that the entire event was really being staged on her behalf; like a "Happy Birthday" party or wedding shower for Sarah, rather than what should have been a more somber event to memorialize the dead "Flight 93 victim" Liz.

I quickly decided to position myself on the sidewalk out in front of the tavern's entrance and began quietly and politely handing out the printed material to patrons entering the place.

This turned out to be wiser than staying inside, as I had barely handed out a few of the things when several people came storming out of the Ropewalk, obviously very upset and angry and confrontational.

"Are you crazy ? Why are you here ? !!! .. Do you know what you're doing ? How can you be so cruel and inconsiderate ? If you have questions about 9/11 this is not the time or place for them. Why don't you do this somewhere else ?"

All of the predictable rhetorical ejaculations emerged; the classic guilt-tripping about "hurting the families" and "disrespecting the victims".

The same manipulative, evasive and diversionary stuff that we've all gotten used to hearing by now, whenever these "sensitive questions" are raised in public.

There were loud attacks on my personal motives and "sanity". I was a bit surprised by the suddenness of it all, but held my ground quietly and firmly.

Even when someone grabbed one of the handouts and tore it up in front of me, I stayed cool and calm and very, very patient.

Sarah herself came out (with father Ben in tow) yelling and melodramatically breaking into tears ... for a brief moment. She quickly recovered though.

Ben said "I'm the father of that poor little girl. How dare you do this ? HOW DARE YOU!!!"

When Esther Heymann presented herself as "the mother", she was a little taken aback by my response: "You mean stepmother, don't you .."

The tension in the air was palpable, with a strong undercurrent of potential violence. Sensing the touchiness of the situation, I stayed quiet and calm, but continued to hand out the materials and periodically respond to the accusations

In short order, several Baltimore City police squad cars pulled up. Then two cops approached me and began to question me. As soon as the cops arrived a young man (late 20s or early 30s) came rushing out of the tavern and told the cops that I had "pushed" him and he wanted to file "assault charges" against me. Soon he was joined by an elderly man claiming to be his father and a "retired FBI agent". I quietly explained to the old man that his son had just lied about the alleged "assault" and reminded him that perjury was a felony.

At this point the cops demanded some identification from me, which they insisted they were legally entitled to see. So I handed them my driver's license and continued to hand out the remaining printed materials. They held the license for about fifteen minutes before returning it to me and sympathetically explained to the offended "family" members that I had a legal, Constitutional right to hand out the printed material, no matter how offensive it might be.

By this time a small crowd had gathered – mostly bar patrons ,waiters and busboys -- so I distributed all the remaining handouts except for one copy.

My rejoinder to all the insults and expressions of outrage was to simply point to the obviously photo-shopped pictures and ask if that was an appropriate way in which to “honor the memory” of someone who was supposed to have been a “victim” on 9/11.

“If indeed she really had been on such a flight ... or if there even was such a flight anyway ... which seems ridiculously implausible by now ...”

After about a half hour, Esther Heymann came back out of the tavern, came right up to me and asked “Please let me have a copy of that so I can look it over”. I gave her the very last copy. She pretended to be mystified about the photos, asking where I had gotten them. “Ask CNN and the New York Times where they got them from ... ” I responded.

Much calmer now, she actually said “Thank you, ma’am” to me, folded up the handout, stuck it in her purse and returned to the tavern.

Having handed out all my materials I asked the police if I could go and they nodded yes.

I have no idea what the blowback from this will be.

If the “family” dares attempt to sue Simon or Hoi for “WEB libel” in the British courts, things could get out of hand for them. I seriously doubt they would take such a risk. Naturally I will be monitoring local mainstream media to see if there is any “ripple effect” from this small bit of street activism.

In a case of constructive fraud, its sometimes difficult to differentiate the mere dupes and pawns from the witting liars and cheats. But I don’t feel burdened by that distinction in this case.

Everyone knows damn well that 9/11 was a monstrous hoax and fraud, on many levels.

How could anyone in good conscience (openly admitting that the official 9/11 narrative has more holes in it than Swiss cheese) argue that after all this time (ten years later) it is somehow “not polite” to raise questions about photo-shopped “memorials” on the WEB ?

I sensed this weakness in the demeanor of the “family” and “supporters” of Sarah Wainio at the Ropewalk Tavern.

Simon and Hoi: Please feel free to publish this account at your WEB site. (I leave the editing for grammar and brevity to your editorial discretion.)

Upon reflection, I confess that my heart was pumping and I was a little sweaty after the intensity of the whole encounter. Yet, at the same time, I found it strangely refreshing, even cleansing and therapeutic.

You guys have done exhaustively detailed and rigorous research on the video and photographic fraud committed by the 9/11 perpetrators in mainstream media, their supine accomplices and lapdogs, and their accessories after the fact.

The media perps of 9/11 are clearly our strategically optimal target.
A soft target. And an easily accessible one.

When it comes to things like color gradients and simulation software, I remain the humble student.

Nevertheless it is the duty of anyone who considers themselves a true “activist” to study your work, publicize it and distribute it widely.

To take your hard work and bring it to “the masses” ... whether they want to see it or not.

As one of your students, I thank you again for providing us with the means to restore sanity and coherence to a sick society. For ourselves as individual activists .. and for everyone willing to face the ugly truth.

the Sai Girl

My warmest congratulations go to the Sai Girl for her commendable mettle - and for providing us priceless insights into just what sort of folks appear to be enmeshed in this massive and ongoing scam. I dearly hope her example will be followed by more brave people genuinely concerned with exposing the scattered network of fraudsters upholding the all-important myth of "3000 victims perishing on 9/11".

By the way, here's a TV news flash featuring "Honor Elizabeth Wainio's" alleged sister, Sarah (commenting on the killing of bogeyman Bin Laden...) :
